Insight/What Drives Them

Life/Culture: “Nothing worth having comes easy”

Much of traditional self-improvement culture is based on discipline, deprivation and sacrifice—where “nothing worth having comes easy.” If you work hard and make smart choices now, you’ll eventually reach those big milestones. But, life is too short to be miserable to maybe get something that seems so out of reach.

Consumer Insight: YOLTO

You only live today—make it something to enjoy. They could get discouraged by the daunting “big G- Goals” and all the responsibilities that take up their attention. But they choose not to. They’re pro small goals—stacking up little wins with dopamine hits and small achievements. Time with their people, little treats, singing in the car, new discoveries—they all bring joy and are their fuel for life.

“NAME”

49M US Adults (18+)
People who don’t do anything by halves—work, family, life.

Spontaneous:

Living more in the moment than the far future, they take joy in side quests and small surprises from where life takes them today.

Striving:

Intentionally and deliberately focusing on the momentum they get from achieving mini milestones that build up to bigger successes.

Busy:

They know life can change fast, so they don’t overthink the choices they make today

Belief/What They Think

Category/For:

A spark of joy in the daily grind

Juice doesn’t need to be a complex functional health ritual or a guilty pleasure you have to earn through discipline and sacrifice. In a non-stop day, it serves as the ultimate micro-reward. It’s a fast, full-flavored win that breaks up the routine with an instant hit of good energy. Pouring a glass gives you a quick, low-stakes victory that keeps your momentum going.
